Question 40 (34 - 40)

The future—electric cars

A Even though owning an electric car is primarily reserved for environmentally conscious people with higher-than-average salaries, more are on the road. Tesla parking in their charging stations is no longer a speculation, but a reality. It is not hard to bear this assumption out, with less than the road being powered by electricity and grow exponentially over the next two decades of electric!

B The driving force behind this shift is to combat climate change. Therefore, vehicles with zero emissions should be produced mainly by part of their commitment to tackling the climate crisis. Countries have promised to stop selling petrol cars within the next ten years. Such an abrupt change would not have been possible a decade ago, because few people could afford the prices of electric car batteries declined 90 per cent in just under a decade, electric cars are now within the average person's price range. The number of electric vehicles on the road has increased since 2010.

C Not all factors agree with the massive shift. Concerns arise simultaneously. Affordable conditions that need to be met before replacing gas-powered ones. Consumers are still uncertain about the practicalities of owning an electric car. These concerns are becoming more pressing as the possibility of owning an electric car becomes no longer a dream. Therefore, many prospective car owners opt to have conventional petrol-driven vehicles instead of buying electric vehicles. "I just doubt if it works in the long run," commented one potential car owner.

D The limited range of electric cars and insufficient charging stations are significant sources of concern, which hinders the 在 E 段落中提及 "Even with new superfast chargers, fully charging an electric vehicle can take up to an hour, let alone the normal ones... it can be problematic when demand for charging ports outstrips supply. And, of course, the more electric vehicles there are, the worse these problems will become in the long run." 得知電動車充電需要很長一段時間，當充電座的需求大過供應時就會產生問題。長遠來說，電動汽車數量越多，充電站的這種問題就更嚴重。這呼應了題目 "The relationship between the number of electric charging stations and electric cars" 「充電站數量與電動車的關係」，故答案為 E。
